

Key Largo Casino features a cozy ambiance and giveaways for Superbowl Sunday

Aruba's newest casino, The Key Largo Casino and Blue Marlin Restaurant featured free beer and snacks for those that came to watch the Colts victory over the Bears. The first one hundred guests also took home a snazzy Key Largo tee shirt, and during the half time, if Prince was not to their tastes, could relax and enjoy the gaming tables or some great food from the restaurant, still keeping on eye on the action.

Casino owner Fred Gillman of the Gillman Group found it a nice relaxing place to enjoy the game, along with his son Charles, a first time visitor to the island. They confessed that they were rooting for neither team, but just enjoyed the easy going surroundings and everyone's else excitement over who scored.

Island ambience is the key at Key Largo, and when the game was over, the house band took over, with island music to bring people away from Miami's steady downpour and back to tropical Aruba. Admittedly, seeing all the raindrops on the camera lenses covering the game gave one a feeling of "being there," but it didn't look like it was any fun for the players as the pigskin went slipping and sliding for what was likely a record number of fumbles during any Superbowl game. Actually, Aruba may have had a taste in the early Sunday morning of what was affecting Miami, but as usual, the sun soon sent the rain clouds scurrying away. This could be considered something of a metaphor for the Colts getting past their performance in the early part of Superbowl 41, and making fans happy. Despite a slow start, their overall performance, as revealed by statistical analysis during the final quarter proved they over-powered and out played the Bears, who started out very strongly. Computer simulations from the website "What If?," which predicted the victory by running simulations 1000 times, had the Colts winning over the Bears "63.5% of the time by an average score of 26-20," quite close to the actual score of 29-17.

Superbowl parties and specials take place all over the island on that special Sunday, as fans finish the season with a flourish, and Key Largo Casino made it a memorable evening for them!
